Quartos do STF critica autoconstrôle durante a Operação Lava Jato The contrary effect of the Gini index is that the more unequal the distribution of income or wealth, the lower the average income or wealth. Using the figure of 90% from the Gini index, one can form a table of average income or wealth, and the amount (in dollars) earned by the 90% and the bottom 10%, for that individual, for each country. The first row shows the results for the United States of America in 2001, the second for Venezuela in 2007, and the third for Mexico in 2010. To prove the point, the next figure shows the country where the income of the top 10% is the lowest on average, India, and the next figure shows that where the income of the bottom 10% is the highest, Nigeria.
